

I, Charles Pendelton, being of insane mind and will, hereby declare this document to be legal and authentic. Furthermore, I would like to certify myself into the nearest sanitarium for further observations of the mind.

Just to be absolutely certain, that this is truly autograph number 003, the paper it has been printed on has been photocopied. If however, the watermark is not exactly where it should be when it is held up to the light and if the autograph does not line up perfectly as well when the two papers are brought together in critical judgement, then indeed, my dear woman you possess a fake. . .

Lest you be of course, kind sir, with which I must then procure you to the noble court in the Arms of Papres.

Should you be called upon to appear before the royal magistrate, it would be wise to hearken unto the voice of reason, in that grandiloquent trial. In no uncertain words, your own conscience. Aside from this, whereas, it may be most befitting in your time of insolence to adhere to those standards, in which mothers have been wrought to suffer in public squares, that terrible waking fire.

In parting, I must state solely for the record that I am indeed Charles Pendelton the raving and we are in fact, in England circa 1612, where it is raining frogs most heavily.

A handwritten signature in cursive script, appearing to read "Charles Pendelton". The signature is written in dark ink and is positioned at the bottom of the page, below the typed text.
